[Toxicological evaluation of therapeutic hemodiaperfusion using regenerated cellulose solution (B.P.53). Comparison with low-osmolar and glucosate solutions]. While perfusion therapeutics with an hyperosmotic solution may cause adverse side effects because of the deleterious effects on the cellular membrane, low-osmolar and glucosate solutions are less toxic. In order to reduce toxicity during hemodiaperfusion, we compared the toxicity of three solutions in vitro. Bone marrow cells from C3H/HeN mice were employed as the cellular model. The three solutions were B.P. 53 (hyperosmotic solution), B.P.I.C. (low-osmolar solution), and glucosate solution. Cell counts after 24 hr incubation in the three solutions were 7.1%, 4.7% and 5.9% (p less than 0.05) of control values with B.P. 53, B.P.I.C. and glucosate solution respectively. Also, cell counts were significantly reduced compared with control values in each of the three solutions in the presence of the antioxidant propyl gallate. When the three solutions were perfused for 10 min using a heparin coated filter, the decrease in red blood cell count after perfusion was 0.47×10^9 , 0.92×10^9 , and 1.44×10^9 cells/ml respectively (p less than 0.05). In the presence of the antioxidant propyl gallate, the hemodilution effect was 1.96×10^9 cells/ml in the B.P. 53 group and 2.13×10^9 cells/ml in the glucosate group (p less than 0.05). Also, the hemodilution effect was 1.63×10^9 cells/ml in the B.P.I.C. group, which was not
