Understanding the mechanism of muscle gene expression is an important first step for improving skeletal muscle function. We hypothesized that shear stress would induce a gene expression profile similar to that observed after stretching. Here, we aimed to evaluate the effect of cyclic stretching on muscle gene expression. In this study, a previously established nonlinear viscoelastic biomechanical stretch apparatus (NLV) was used for stretching to minimize shear stress. Adult Wistar rats were either stretched for 1 or 3 h on day 1 of the training week and the trained and untrained legs were separated for subsequent analysis. Differentially expressed genes were identified using GeneChip technology. Of the genes upregulated by stretching (372), the majority were involved in cell differentiation and organization and ion transport. Of the genes downregulated by stretching (26), the majority were involved in the mitochondria. In addition, stretching altered the extracellular matrix and axon guidance. Finally, a few differentially expressed genes were involved in transcription and circadian rhythm. In conclusion, cyclic stretching significantly upregulates a large number of gene transcripts in skeletal muscle.The 2nd Quarter just started.
