It is a suite of software for creating, editing, and analyzing map data with ArcGIS®. Cardiac and aortic surgeries are associated with excessive postoperative hemorrhage with increased risk of morbidity and mortality. The main cause of postoperative hemorrhage is rupture of a vessel caused by ischemia or systemic inflammatory response triggered by cardiopulmonary bypass (CPB). Rapid delivery of packed red blood cells (RBC) leads to improved outcome. RBC transfusion is associated with increased risk of infection and other complications. However, there is no consensus on the optimal transfusion regimen and strategies for decreasing transfusion requirements have been underused. A better understanding of the vascular biology of patients undergoing cardiac surgery requires preclinical models that mimic human hemostasis and thrombosis. As pointed out by Thomson, currently used blood substitutes, such as hydroxyethyl starch (HES), are not sufficient to prevent CPB-associated coagulopathy and have been shown to exacerbate this coagulopathy with up-regulation of thrombotic factors and down-regulation of platelet activating factors.[@B1] The aim of this commentary is to review the current literature on use of preclinical models for improving our understanding of the underlying mechanisms of inflammatory activation of platelets and subsequent responses that lead to hypercoagulation following CPB and strategies to mitigate these effects. The largest clinical study regarding hemostasis in cardiac surgery was published by the *Transfusion Research Committee* in 1992 which showed that every unit of blood transfused was associated with a 9.2% reduction in in-hospital mortality for open heart surgery (p=0.009).[@B2] Since then there have been many studies evaluating various forms of blood transf c6a93da74d
